The examination of Clark and Horace Wentworth will come off at Manchester the last part of this week, probably Thursday.

The examination of the two brothers at South-Berwick, which was to have taken place to day, will not take place until after that at Manchester. The law of Maine, unlike that of other States, will not grant a surrender of prisoners until some examination has taken place. The examination at Berwick will only aim to effect that object, after which the prisoners will be taken to Manchester and examined again before acquitted or committed. Clark has employed as his counsel Charles G. Atherton, Esq. of Nashua, and Horace Wentworth has retained B. F. Butler and J. G. Abbott. Esqs.

The Present Race of Turks.

The Turks in Constantinople certainly looked machless like Turks, and were far more civil, than in 1832. They were incomparably less picturesque and imposing in their outward as pearance. The forced change of costume has transformed them into a rather mean, shably-looking people. But for the giaring red fexz (a mean, ungraceful head-covering in itself.) they might pass for Franks who employed had tailors and seldom got their clothes breahed. A blue frock-coat buttoned up to the chin, and dirty duck pantaloons not wider than we wear thom, were the prevailing fashing. In my time, Saltan Mahmoud had made war on flowing, bright-colored robes, and a fierce attack on the loose, baggy netter garments of the Mussulmans; but still the prejudice was strong in favor of an amplitude of trousers, and a shabby fellow continued to tude of trousers, and a shabby fellow continued to be designated as a "tight breeches," or "narrow breeches," but now every man's breeches were people, Oalema, Dervishes, and a few old-fashioned poole, Onlems, Dervishes, and a few old-fashioned a country people from the mountains in Europe or from the interior of Asia Minor. In many cases it tout me thought and trouble to distinguish between Mussulmans and Rayahs. Twenty years ago there was no possibility of confounding them; for, even without the then marked distinctions of dress, of head guar, of boots or papoushes, the Osmanlees were to be known by their swaggering gait, their overhearing looks, and their contemptuous, insolent manters. The Turks now seem to have lost their policy and their sense of importance. Over in the manders. The Turks now seem to have lost their pile and their sense of importance. Over in the city they were the quietest and most modest part of the population. Their former swagger and rudeness appeared to be transferred to the Armenian serafts and their dependents. Where I had been repeatedly insulted, and more than once spat at by the Turkish rabble, we certainly found nothing now but civility. In 1828 there was no going across the Golden Horn into Constantinople without being attended by one or two armed Turks; and the presence and guard of the faithful could not always acreen one from the most gross and opprobrious had used to be are now alone, my son and I. In the binars we meet some Frank ladies, dressed in the French fashion, usveiled and unattended, valking about unconcernedly and making their problems. The iterat witness swern was Josiah S. Col. Safe, who says that on the 21st of Nov. last the defendant came to his office and offered a $500 note, purporting to be on the Marchants' and Traders. Bank, for which he wanted gold. There was not officient gold in the office, and witness requested for the purpose of getting gold; but when in the street heard that there had been a questionable bill, similar to the one now held by him, effered by an eighbor on the previous day. He then went back and asked Foster where he got the bill, and was told by him that he obtained it from a merchant at Pier No. 18. This testimony was corroborated by witness father, who was afterward washing about unconcernedly and making their begange. We are now alone, my son and i. In the birnars we meet some Frank ladies, dressed in the French fashion, unvoided and unastended, walking about unconcernedly and making their purchases. They are constantly doing this, walking over by the Galata Bridge, which is about the best promenade here, and walking quietly back in the midst of Turks, and not unfrequently in the midst of making a frequency in two midst of the same to the following the midst of the second to the teeth, must be spoken to half a dozen cavasses or chaoushes, gived and armed to the teeth, must be provided for the escort by some embassy or other, or the ladies must be mulled up and disguised in Turkish costume, and wear the white muslin facetovering yashmac, which makes the liveliest and breliest of living women look like so many walking spectres. "On a charge fout cela! On a bien fail." It must be noted, however, that we did not broad far from the bazzars, where they are secusion. This mittens a good deal of the old fanation and hatred of Christians remained, and that we could seldom walk or ride about without being landed; and it was fear, sheer fear of conte-

The Turks in Constantinople certainly looked mother, and would not permit it to be taken away. A part of it was afterwards transported by Mrs. Catherine C. to a third party, and it is said her step farther acted and advised in her doing so. The present action is brought for the value. On the rale adopted at the time Mrs. Catherine C. could not put in a plea of denial on account of having a husband, and her husband could not because ing a husband, and her husband could not because he was away, so that the matter goes by default as to them, and that this suit is to test the liability of the step father. The Court said the father would have a right to advise his daughter, and prohibit any person taking away the property till the ownership was decided—but he knew there was an adverse claim, and went beyond in advising as to any portion of it being parted with.—Judament for plaintiff for return of property or $100 damages.

It struck me, however, that the common people in the capital fasted with better humon now people in the capital fasted with better humon now than formerly. A new school Turk would tell me the reason—it was because a great many of them had emancipated themselves from prejudice and emancipated themselves from prejudice and leave the money changed.
